

Reality Transurfing

Vadim Zeland

THE ARGUMENT

Why does the thing you want most keep slipping away the harder you chase it, and what would it mean to choose it instead?

Desires do not come true, and dreams do not come true, because wanting is itself the obstacle. Every possible outcome already exists in the alternatives space, an information field holding every script and set of scenery that could ever be. Your thought energy lights up one sector of it, and that sector becomes the layer of your world. You are always on the lifeline that matches what you radiate.

Struggle fails for two reasons. Pendulums, the energy structures built by people thinking alike, harvest your attention whether you love a thing or hate it, and pull you onto their lines. And importance, any meaning inflated beyond its weight, creates excess potential that balanced forces flatten, usually against the person who inflated it.

So the method runs in order. Step out of the pendulum's game. Lower importance. Stop fighting the flow of alternatives and let it carry the solution to you. Then choose, with outer intention: not the wish to have, and not the effort to get, but the calm resolve to have. The world behaves like a mirror, and it reflects that resolve, slowly, as long as you hold it.

THE FRAMEWORK — CHOOSING A LIFELINE

Transurfing is not a set of moves executed one, two, three. It is a way of relating to the world, and the steps below are the order in which the obstacles come down. The first four clear the ground; the last three are the choice itself.

- 1 The alternatives space Every outcome already exists. You do not create reality or fight it; your thought energy selects the sector that materializes.
- 2 Out of the pendulum's game Pendulums feed on your emotions, for or against. Ignore rather than avoid, or break the script they expect.
- 3 Lower importance Inflated meaning is excess potential, and balanced forces remove it. Take care without worrying.
- 4 Go with the flow The flow of alternatives follows the path of least resistance and already carries the solution. Shift from control to observation.
- The ground is clear With importance low and no pendulum holding the strings, there is nothing to defend and nothing to conquer. Now you can choose.
- 5 Outer intention The resolve to have, not the wish to have or the struggle to get. It works in the unity of heart and mind.
- 6 The target slide Picture the goal as already reached and turn it in your mind, systematically, for long enough. Leave the means out.
- 7 Your own goal, your own door A goal that is yours makes life a celebration and fulfils your other desires along the way. Only the heart can tell you which it is.

CHOOSE THE FRAME

You do not have to fight for happiness, only choose it

Everything that could happen already exists in the alternatives space, stored like frames on a roll of film. Thought energy has parameters, and when it is radiated it lights up the sector that matches it. That sector materializes as the layer of your world. You are always on the lifeline that corresponds to what you are radiating.

The clearest demonstration is the negativist. People inclined to expect the worst watch their worst expectations arrive with remarkable reliability. If thought can steer events that accurately in one direction, it can steer them in the other. The pessimist has already proved the mechanism works; they have simply been using it against themselves.

You cannot change the scenery of the line you are on, and fighting it only binds you to it. Every struggle yields for a moment and then slaps back. What you can change is which scenery you are standing in. Choosing a different alternative is not a battle. It is closer to picking something off a shelf.

HATE IT, HAVE MORE

Hating something is the surest way to have more of it

When many people think in the same way, their thought energy fuses into an independent structure, a pendulum. It feeds on its adherents through their emotions: indignation, fear, guilt, admiration, contempt. It does not care which. Love a thing or detest it, if your thoughts are fastened on it you are tuned to its frequency and carried to lines where it is plentiful.

Picture someone who detests apples. They cannot simply pass them by; the existence of apples offends them, and they say so every time. On the energetic level this person is gorging on apples, stuffing their pockets, eating until they are sick, and complaining all the while that they cannot stand the things.

To remove something from your life, ignore it. Do not avoid it. Avoiding means you have already let it into your space and are now pushing it back out, which keeps it there. Ignoring means not reacting, so it never enters. You are a radio: change the station, and the programme you hated simply stops playing.

SAME LOG, HIGHER STAKES

The more it matters, the less likely it becomes

Importance is meaning ascribed out of proportion. It creates excess potential, a local disturbance in an otherwise even field, and balanced forces arise to remove it. They act in whatever way is quickest, which is usually against the person who created the disturbance. That is why a desperate wish so often produces the exact opposite of what was wanted.

Walking along a log lying on the ground is trivial. Lay the same log across the roofs of two tall buildings and the identical walk becomes enormously important, and nothing you tell yourself will change that. The task has not changed at all. Only the importance has, and the importance is what makes you fall.

Importance comes in two kinds. Inner importance overrates or underrates yourself, and playing small creates as much potential as boasting, only with the opposite charge. Outer importance overrates something in the world. Confidence is the same excess potential as insecurity. Take care of what matters, but without worrying about it.

THE MIRROR IS SLOW

The world mirrors what you hold in mind, and it is slow

The world behaves like a dual mirror: one side is physical, the other lies in the alternatives space. It reflects your relationship to it. It reflects the content of that relationship and ignores its tone, so thinking hard about what you do not want gives the mirror a clear image of exactly that. Fear comes true easily because heart and mind agree in it.

Stand before an ordinary mirror, but imagine one that lags. You smile and the reflection stays serious. You raise your arms and drop them again, and nothing changes. To see your arms raised you have to hold them up for a long time. Material reality is inert, like tar, and most people let their arms fall before it has caught up.

Stop looking into the mirror to see what is there and then reacting to it. That makes reality the image and you the reflection. Glance at it instead, only to look for signs of the new picture forming, and keep holding the image in the meantime. Think about what you are striving for, not about what you are escaping.

YOUR KEY, YOUR DOOR

Your own goal feels like a celebration; a foreign one feels like a duty

Pendulums hand people goals that serve the pendulum: the prestigious career, the thing kept under lock and key, the achievement that proves something to others. Such a goal feels like an obligation and runs on endless obstacles. Your own goal is different. It makes your life a celebration, and reaching it fulfils your other desires along the way.

Pendulums sell their pattern of success and say, do as I do. Yet the stars they point to succeeded precisely because they went their own way. Only your soul knows the algorithm of your success. People who follow the pattern study professions that are not theirs and take work that is prestigious and feels alien.

Ask what your heart is drawn to and what would make life joyful, and do not think about the means until you know. Then listen to the inner voice. The mind's inhibition, the sense of being unworthy, can be removed. The soul's discomfort, a quiet unwillingness, cannot, and it means the goal is not yours.

THE WINDOW IS OPEN

STRAIGHT AT IT

THE WAY

The means will present themselves if you stop steering

Cause and effect form a current through the alternatives space, and it takes the path of least resistance, so it already carries the most economical solution to your problem. The restless mind keeps trying to seize control, and its decisions are mostly hands slapping at the water. It is the mind, not the stream, that brings you to the edge of the waterfall.

A fly beats itself against the windowpane beside an open window. All its life it has been taught that when you see the goal you fly straight at it. People do the same when they cannot see how to reach something: they hit the glass of the obvious route and conclude the goal is impossible.

Move the centre of gravity from control to observation. Most problems, especially small ones, resolve themselves if you do not obstruct them. Watch for signs, which appear as a sense that something is not quite right, and take spontaneous phrases seriously. Let go of control, and you find you have genuine control.

ACTIONS

STEP OUT OF THE SWING

Step out of the pendulum's game, or break its script

When something hooks you, name the emotion it is pulling on and decline to answer at that frequency. Do what you would normally do, but from the position of an observer. Zeland calls this renting yourself out: you give your hands and your time to the task, and keep your inner space empty of the problem.

When a pendulum cannot be ignored, change the script it is running. If a boss is bearing down, do not argue or refuse; ask his advice on how the job is best done, and his energy turns elsewhere. Warm, positive visualization of an aggressive person gently stills a human pendulum, and its freed energy becomes yours.

When a pendulum cannot be ignored, change the script it is running. If a boss is bearing down, do not argue or refuse; ask his advice on how the job is best done, and his energy turns elsewhere. Warm, positive visualization of an aggressive person gently stills a human pendulum, and its freed energy becomes yours.

Cutting yourself off from every pendulum leaves you in a desert: fewer problems and no achievements either. The human world is built of pendulums and they are what turn dreams into reality. The aim is to choose your own pendulums consciously, not to be free of them all.

PLAN B, THEN GO

Lower the stakes before you act

Before anything that matters, build a safety net: a plan B, an alternative route, a substitute if this door closes. Then accept the possibility of defeat once, deliberately, and act. Imagining the worst case is a one-time event, not a place to live. Importance drops the moment failure stops being the end of the world.

Do not fight fear or talk yourself out of it; the battle drains the energy that is feeding the anxiety. If you are nervous before a presentation, be nervous, fully and with pleasure. Allowed, the nerves dissolve. The same rule runs through the rest: not to worry, act; not to wait in expectation, act.

Do not fight fear or talk yourself out of it; the battle drains the energy that is feeding the anxiety. If you are nervous before a presentation, be nervous, fully and with pleasure. Allowed, the nerves dissolve. The same rule runs through the rest: not to worry, act; not to wait in expectation, act.

Stop justifying yourself, and set no ultimatums. Guilt and the need to prove yourself are both importance, and both invite someone to judge you. You have the right to be yourself. If you cannot let go of a resentment, give yourself permission not to, and that too lowers the charge.

LIVE IN THE SLIDE

Turn the target slide until the mirror catches up

Build a mental picture of the goal as though it has already been reached, pleasing to both heart and mind, and entirely your own, never copied from someone else. Look at it often and add detail each time. Leave the means out of it completely. Live in the slide, and move one foot at a time in its direction.

The secret is ordinary persistence: turn the slide systematically for long enough. While the mind doubts, the image stays hazy; keep going. If the route is unclear, visualize the slide rather than the process, and picture the process only as the next link in the chain. When hope has done its work, you stop wanting and stop hoping. You intend.

The secret is ordinary persistence: turn the slide systematically for long enough. While the mind doubts, the image stays hazy; keep going. If the route is unclear, visualize the slide rather than the process, and picture the process only as the next link in the chain. When hope has done its work, you stop wanting and stop hoping. You intend.

Expect a pause in which nothing changes, and sometimes problems surfacing to spite you. The mirror works with a delay. Do not look round, as in the fairy tale where looking back turns you to stone. A slide can remove an inhibition; it cannot remove the soul's discomfort with a goal that is not yours.

AT THE FORK, SAY YES

Take joy in setbacks, and say so every time

Every event forks the lifeline into a favourable and an unfavourable branch, and your relationship to the event chooses which you take. So decide in advance that any apparently negative change to the script is for the good. Adopt what Zeland calls the foolish habit of taking joy in setbacks, and hold it without exception.

Choose an amalgam formula, a single line that sets the background of your world, such as: my world takes care of me. Confirm it at every event, large or trivial. When something goes well, tell yourself the world is looking after you. When something disappoints, tell yourself everything is unfolding as it should.

Choose an amalgam formula, a single line that sets the background of your world, such as: my world takes care of me. Confirm it at every event, large or trivial. When something goes well, tell yourself the world is looking after you. When something disappoints, tell yourself everything is unfolding as it should.

This is not sitting with folded arms, and it is not suppressing what you feel. People habitually voice their attitude to life only when dissatisfied and take good things for granted. The practice reverses that habit. Persistent effort is needed only at first, until it runs on its own.

GIVE, AND IT COMES

Replace the intention to get with the intention to give

In any conversation, shift your attention from yourself to the other person, and find the thing they are proud of or passionate about. Let them talk about it. People are not assessing how interesting you are; they are assessing how well you might serve their sense of self-worth. Give them that, sincerely.

A successful businessman once said that everyone offers him something and nobody asks what he needs. Ask. Admit your mistakes without justifying them, defend others when they are right, and ask a small favour, which lowers your importance and raises theirs. Abandon the intention to get and you receive the very thing you gave up.

A successful businessman once said that everyone offers him something and nobody asks what he needs. Ask. Admit your mistakes without justifying them, defend others when they are right, and ask a small favour, which lowers your importance and raises theirs. Abandon the intention to get and you receive the very thing you gave up.

Never do anything that wounds another person's self-esteem, including winning an argument. Arguing and criticism are the mind fighting the flow. And do not try to change anyone, yourself included; the method uses the other person's inner intention without compromising their interests.

VOCABULARY

Zeland builds a whole model from a small set of coined terms, and he insists it is only a model: its value is in what you can do with it. The terms matter because the method turns on distinctions ordinary language blurs, such as ignoring against avoiding, or intending against wanting.

Alternatives space

An infinite information field holding every possible event, past and future, each with its script and scenery. Physical reality is the sector currently materialized.

Lifeline

A chain of neighbouring sectors of roughly uniform quality. Life runs stably along one until thought energy shifts and it turns onto another.

Pendulum

An energy-information structure created when many people think alike. It grows on its adherents' emotions and leads them away from their own happiness.

Importance

Meaning ascribed out of proportion. Inner importance overrates or underrates yourself; outer importance overrates something in the world.

Excess potential and balanced forces

Importance disturbs the energy field; balanced forces arise to flatten the disturbance, which is why you so often get the opposite of what you intended.

Alternatives flow

The current of cause and effect through the space. It takes the path of least resistance, so it already holds the most economical solution.

Outer intention

The resolve to have, which lets the world fulfil your will. Inner intention achieves a goal by acting on the world; outer intention chooses it.

Slide

A picture carried in your head that others do not share. Negative slides distort perception; a target slide shows the goal as already reached.

Coordination of intention

Every event forks into a favourable and an unfavourable branch. Decide to read an apparent setback as positive and you step onto the favourable one.

QUICK REFERENCE

THE PREMISE	Every outcome already exists. Thought energy selects which sector materializes. You choose; you do not fight.
PENDULUMS	Fed by emotion for or against. Ignore, do not avoid. Cornered: break the script. Rent yourself out.
IMPORTANCE	Excess potential summons balanced forces. Take care without worrying. Safety net, accept defeat once, act.
NEGATIVE INFORMATION	Reacting to it induces a shift onto negative lines. Do not let it into your layer: express no interest.
THE FLOW	It holds the least-resistance solution. Control to observation. Signs feel like something is not quite right.
INTENTION	Inner intention acts on the world; outer intention is the resolve to have. Heart and mind must agree.
THE TARGET SLIDE	The goal already reached, your own image, no means in it. Turn it systematically. The mirror lags.
GOALS AND DOORS	Your goal is a celebration, a foreign one an obligation. Inspiration on the path marks your door.
EVERY DAY	Joy in setbacks. My world takes care of me. Give, not get. Permission to be yourself, and for others to be themselves.

When hope has done its work, you stop wanting and you stop hoping. You intend.